FIRST THINGS FIRST

Confucius said that the example which the governor of a province sets is far more important than his official acts and utterances. It is easy to agree. An official act can be set aside or undone. But leadership with candor, insight, and sense of honor and responsibility might be able to block the gradual deterioration of society so apparent today or, even to reverse it through strong dynamic power. But where is such leadership to come from through the cloud of commercialism, self-interest, and greed for money and show that befog the dream of worth and greatness once expressed vocally in lofty terms and with conviction?

Rosh Hashonah, the New Year, envisions the people of the earth as banded together to do God's holy will, to combine all their constructive forces for the welfare of all humanity through the establishment of a righteous society. The cornerstone of such a society has nothing to do with material wealth above or below the surface of the earth. It is just a simple sounding element like "happiness" that is the essential ingredient for the welfare of society. It is old Jewish teaching repeated through centuries that the happiness of the world rests upon justice, truth, and peace and without them there can be no happiness and eventually no world. Justice, which comes first, can not be merely a day-dreaming word sighed over by poetic and impractical idealists.

Justice, the ideal, must be made a reality by being written into law for conducting life by rules of procedure applicable to every man. Individual security and well-being are commensurate with the degree of justice available to each person. The ancient teachers looked upon truth as the most important principle in the world, the beginning, the end and the middle of civilized life. But neither justice nor truth nor the two together are enough without peace.

Peace, which originates in the home, must include the corners of the earth which are now too near to each other to escape the corroding effects of the bloodshed, contention, and hatred which distort young life far away from the field of battle. In such a world there can be no true happiness of the spirit. Therefore justice, truth, and peace are imperative for the kind of world men think about at the New Year.

In a world of cruel bars against brotherhood and equality it is within the power of each person of any creed, country, or color to redeem or improve himself by loyalty to the ancient, recognized ideals and codes. Wherever his abode and whatever his station and however he prays, the Jewish holy day of Rosh Hashonah is also for him and being one of the human family he understands its message: Life is brief and fleeting and should be lived in a way that makes for well-being and happiness, the well-being and happiness of home, group, city, country, and the world to its farthest reaches.

Judaism is a religion which was developed by the Jews not only for themselves but to establish their great social ideals for the benefit of the world. Therefore, it is their duty at the New Year to refresh themselves by re-dedication to those ideals as the standard of their daily life and for the public aims of their group. Whatever is good and acceptable against the evils of the world, that is what the Lord requires of the Jew. Against whatever is bad and unacceptable "he shall not fail nor be discouraged till he have set justice in the earth."

This is a cheap and tawdry age of declining standards of taste and morality; parental abdication or weakness; surrender to materialism; criminality of mind; rising crime and corruption; lowered personal and official integrity; disregard for basic good character; lack of respect for high principles first before a car, and for strict honesty in all areas of life, besides mere money honesty; the careless low appraisal of moral fibre as compared with high living; and other evils which constitute the cause of internal crumbling of the individual personality. But this keystone of the group and of the country, is their real, actual wealth above all else. Without it there can be no stable, democratic society with guts and a sense of direction toward achievement.

Let the Shofar, the ram's horn, sound out to remind the Jews that they stand for freedom, justice, equality, humanitarianism, truth, law, all these underpinnings of modern democracy. Without freedom man cannot improve himself. He must have elbow room and breathing space for self-advancement. If he cannot improve himself he cannot take his proper place and help others. Justice must protect all men alike by laws which apply to all alike. Laws founded on moral principles will protect also the alien and there must be no second-grade citizenship. Equality for all, based on the assumption that all men are brothers, means that each is equal in his right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Nothing less than equality can guard the dignity and sanctity of the human personality. Anything that diminishes it should be regarded as treason in a democracy. Humanitarianism is an all-inclusive word for all kinds of helpfulness, tolerance, aid, charity, constructive co-operation. Truth is essential to the maintenance of democracy and access to it is a must for good citizenship. Support of these things is what the Lord requires of the Jews.

Today conformity poses a formidable challenge to lovers of freedom. Strong and large groups exert steady and increasing pressure in democracies where the right to differ, freedom of dissent, was thought to have been secure forever. But their citizens held it too lightly. Those who predicted that their liberties could be removed in a few years were not taken seriously. Today forces are openly at work to make it wrong and criminal to differ. They want to make all people think, feel, speak, write, and live according to a single pattern so that everything can be nice and quiet and under control.

Whatever is individual, original, different, pioneering or adventuring will be ruled out, or punished, or allowed to languish if they win out. The boldest opponent will land in prison. The meekest will be a prison with himself as keeper. Freedom of speech, press, and assembly will be driven underground. Constitutional guarantees will be nothing. The right and duty to disagree and the duty to tolerate, listen, and answer will be lost. Conformity could drive Jews to assimilate and thus destroy Jewish unity. Here is something evil, unacceptable, and menacing for all free men, especially Jews, to be against "till they have set justice in the earth."

One of the greatest wonders in the world is the fact that throughout centuries in which Jews were ostracized, exiled, tortured, excluded, or butchered at the hands or instigation of fellow-humans all over the earth, it became and has remained their temper and habit to maintain a rooted faith in the greatest good for the greatest number and in the final outcome as the establishment of a better life in which all the human family will share. If they look about them they can see that some of their social ideals which are thousands of years old and stem from the Bible, the well of living waters, have been put into practical effect for the benefit of all citizens of modern democracies. The New Year holiday with its emphasis on a fresh start each year and on pressing forward in progress is symbolic of Jewish hope.

THE JEW FACES THE WORLD

BY RABBI MENDELL LEWITTES OF YOUNG ISRAEL SYNAGOGUE, OF MONTREAL

After each sounding of the Shofar during the chanting of the Mussaf service on Rosh Hashonah, we proclaim, "Today is the birthday of the world." Indeed, it is commonly accepted that Rosh Hashonah is the anniversary of Creation. For this reason, Rosh Hashonah, from amongst all Jewish holidays, is distinguished by its universal tones.

Every other holiday centers about the historical experience of the Children of Israel. Our prayers on those occasions concern our hopes for the future of the Jewish people. Rosh Hashonah, however, marks no event peculiar to the Jewish people. It goes back to the very beginnings of humanity, long before men were divided into races and peoples and tongues. Thus we open our petition in the Amidah with a plea that concerns all of God's creatures. "May all Thy creatures worship Thee and join in one union to do Thy will with a perfect heart."

One would therefore assume that here there is no difference of opinion amongst our religious teachers; all agree that the world, or, more properly, Man, who is the apex of Creation, was created on the first day of Tishri, the day on which Rosh Hashonah is celebrated. And yet, strangely enough, we find two Tannaim, teachers of the Mishna, maintaining opposing views concerning this tradition.

Rabbi Eliezer says, "The world was created in the month of Tishri." Rabbi Yehoshua says, "The world was created in the month of Nisan." What is even more remarkable is the fact that their views concerning the date of the world's creation determine their respective views concerning the time of the future redemption of Israel. R. Eliezer, who maintains that the world was created in Tishri, asserts that redemption also will take place in Tishri. Whereas R. Yehoshua, who maintains that the world was created in Nisan, asserts that redemption will come to pass in Nisan.

What is the significance of this Talmudic disputation? What difference does it make whether the world was created in the month of Tishri or in the month of Nisan? And why should that make a difference as to when the future redemption will come about?

Before we attempt to answer this question, may I present another statement from the Talmud, as follows: "When we say in our Rosh Hashonah prayers: 'This day is the beginning of Thy works', we are following the opinion of R. Eliezer." Whereupon the Tosafot commentary asks: "Then why, in our Passover prayers, do we say that the world was created in Nisan? How can we on Rosh Hashonah follow one opinion and on Pesach follow the contrary opinion?" And the answer given is that both views are valid, and are reconciled in this way.

Tishri was the month when the idea of creation was first conceived by the Creator, but Nisan is the month when the world was actually created. That is to say that the plan, or original design, came six months earlier than the actual execution of the plan. The change in time, we must conclude, represented a change in the original design. For some reason, which we shall attempt to discover, the world when created did not measure up in all respects to God's original intention.

We find in the Mishna that both the first day of Nisan and the first day of Tishri are considered to be Rosh Hashonah, the first day of a new year. The former, Nisan, is Rosh Hashonah for Israel's kings, whereas the latter, Tishri, is Rosh Hashonah for the kings of all other peoples. Thus Nisan represents the beginning for the Jewish people and Tishri represents the beginning for the world at large. Nisan is the symbol for a unique people, chosen from amongst the family of all peoples; Tishri is the symbol of the community of all nations and the brotherhood of all mankind.

Thus R. Eliezer and R. Yehoshua are engaged not in a purely theoretical question, but are positing their particular views concerning the basic ideals of humanity and its aspirations to achieve a perfect society. Though both subscribed to the basic tenet of Judaism that God chose the children of Israel to be an "am segulah", a precious people, the question in their minds was this: which fact is more basic and requires more emphasis, what ideal can more readily enable us to achieve the perfect society, the universality of mankind or the chosenness of Israel?

R. Eliezer maintains that Tishri is supreme, that the world was created for the sake of universal brotherhood. The distinctions between one people and another, the classification into different races and creeds, are incidental to the greater purpose of achieving one indivisible humanity wherein all individuals will subscribe to the same creed of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Only through the constant emphasis upon the essential unity of all men will we be able to bring closer that Messianic era so strikingly described by the prophets of Israel, the era of universal disarmament and peace.

R. Yehoshua, on the other hand, maintains that Nisan is supreme, that the world will attain its true character only after there is born a people which is ready to enter into a special covenant with God to be the bearers of His truth. Social and ethical progress in this world cannot be achieved through an anonymous humanity, where everyone shares an equal responsibility for the moral level of society.

There has to be a special segment of humanity which will take upon itself a special responsibility for human brotherhood; a unique people that will consecrate itself to the ideals of justice and peace; a society within world society which will strive to incorporate these ideals into its own social pattern and thus serve as the example par excellence to the rest of the world.

This select group, this chosen people, will have to concentrate upon preserving its peculiar identity, fashioning its own distinctive way of life, clinging fast under all circumstances to its ideals, and eventually bringing about the rest of the world to its ideals. "In Nisan will redemption come." Only if the Jewish people are loyal to their own tradition will redemption come, not for themselves alone but for all mankind.

As the Tosafot explained, even R. Yehoshua would agree that the world was first conceived in universal terms. When God thought of creating a world peopled by human beings, it was to be a world of universal brotherhood without distinction as to race or creed. But when it came to the actual creation, when man was already placed upon earth and told to obey the word of God, it became apparent through man's disobedience that there had to be a process of choosing, choosing the one man who was ready to dedicate his life and the lives of his children to keep the way of God.

This select man was Abraham, of whom God said, "For I have known him that he commands his children and his household after him that they keep the way of the Lord, to do righteousness and justice." Abraham's children, his household after him, is the House of Israel.

And so we today, the descendants of Abraham, are part of the world and at the same time apart from the world. And we approach the world not merely as fellow human beings, but also and especially so as Jews. We see world problems through the spectacles of Jewish living and thinking. Living as a Jew does not mean that we retire from the world into our own corner, abandoning the world to its own difficulties and seeking our own exclusive salvation. Nothing that concerns humanity at large is alien to the Jew, but his concern is expressed by means of the traditional Jewish outlook.

There is a prayer in our liturgy which was originally composed for the Rosh Hashonah service, but because of its great importance it was added as the concluding prayer of every daily service. I refer to the "Oleinu" prayer. In it, we first give praise to the Almighty that He did not make us, the Jewish people, identical with the other peoples of the earth, that we are distinguished from all others by our faith; but then, in the second paragraph, we express our hope that all humanity will be united in a common faith and allegiance to the One God.

The Jew who thinks that he can approach his non-Jewish neighbour merely as a fellow human being without acknowledging his Jewishness, is an incomplete human being. He has lost the essential characteristic through which he can assert and achieve his brotherhood with all mankind, namely his Jewish heritage, the teachings of his religious tradition.

As we view the world situation today and attempt to assess the progress of humanity towards world peace, we do so in Jewish terms. We measure world politics by its relationship to the Jewish people. If, for example, the leader of the Western democracies speaks of peace with justice, we test the sincerity of his program for peace by the justice he is ready to render world Jewry, and particularly the State of Israel.

This is not chauvinism, it is not an exaggerated sense of our own importance, it is not a selfish concern with our own special interests and a disregard for the welfare of all peoples. We do so because we realize that the world will achieve true progress only if it affords Israel the maximum opportunity to pursue its prophetic ideals. We know full well that a rejection of the aspirations of the Jewish people is a rejection, conscious or subconscious, of Jewish ideals, which are the very basis of universal peace with justice.

For this reason, as long as Soviet Russia remains hostile to the Jews within its borders and hostile to the State of Israel, we can only view with scepticism its bold plan for complete disarmament and its profession of peaceful co-existence. It has already been noted that the plan for total disarmament proposed by the leader of Soviet Russia is the plan already proposed by the ancient Hebrew prophet Isaiah.

Our hopes would be more sanguine if the Russian leader were to acknowledge this publicly and take another look at the Book of Isaiah. There he would find the prelude to universal disarmament, the only basis upon which such a plan can really be brought into being. "And many peoples will say, 'Let us go up to the Mount of the Lord . . . that He will teach us of His ways and we will walk in His paths, for out of Zion shall go forth the Torah . . . and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares'." Herein is to be found the much-sought-for system of inspection and control, that all nations acknowledge the sovereignty of God and, inspired by the teaching of His prophets, pursue justice and uphold human dignity and freedom within their respective borders.

The fundamental thesis which we have propounded is one of the lessons symbolized in the drama of the Akeda, the binding of Isaac, which is the Torah portion read on Rosh Hashonah. At first God says to Abraham, "Take thy only son, thy chosen one, and offer him up." This is the ideal situation which God first conceived on Tishri, the situation where we can dispense with a favorite son, where all sons are equally chosen for the noble tasks of humanity.

But, then, seeing the unique devotions to God's purpose of Abra-

Standing By Old Truths While Reaching Out For New Ways

BY RABBI LOUIS J. CASHDAN, 61 BURNSIDE DRIVE, TORONTO, OF TEMPLE EMANU-EL

Rosh Hashonah is a time of self searching. At the beginning of the New Year we take spiritual inventory of our lives during the past year and examine ourselves in the light of the teaching of our religion. In reviewing the events of the past year we may well ask: how can we relate our ancient spiritual legacy to the problems that confront us in this space and rocket age? We find a sagacious answer to this question in the generalization of a great statesman, who said: "We must know when to stand by old truths and when to strike out in new experimental ways." We must not make the mistake of confusing old truths that carry a dynamic and contemporary message with old ways that have become obsolescent either in religion, or government, or in our personal lives.

The wonders of our age have permanently supplanted the primitive methods of the past. This is as it should be. It would be contrary to the principles of our religion to stem the tide of human progress. The miracles of the twentieth century, whether we like them or not, are here to stay. The marvels of science have succeeded in doing physically what the prophets of Israel sought to do spiritually. Our civilization has brought nations physically closer to each other than ever before. Today all men are in close physical proximity to each other.

We are as near to each other as the distance that guided missiles can travel, but only the old truths of religion can produce men and women guided by the paths of righteousness and peace. We are as near to each other as the speed of light in our instantaneous electronic communications to all parts of the globe, but only the prophetic ideals of our faith can produce men and women with the light of God in their hearts, men and women whom we would confidently entrust with the experimental ways of the twentieth century.

Our experiments with rockets, jet power, and supersonic speeds have made the whole world one neighborhood, but only the old truths of religion can make man neighborly. Our incomparable economy, our expanded educational opportunities, our media of communication, our experimentation with new ways have produced the highest standards of living known to man, but only the application of the old truths of religion can raise the level of our lives and reflect our faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

In contrasting the old with the new we must ask whether we have experienced a spiritual advancement which can match our unparalleled development of science and technology. Are the experimental ways of the twentieth century obscuring our vision of God in our search for faith and freedom? I am deeply convinced that men and women are coming to grips with the old truths of Judaism, that the ideals of the prophets of Israel are more vibrant, are more truly alive in our time than when they were first enunciated.

When Amos spoke of justice in the villages of Israel, the people who could hear him were limited by the range of his voice, and we may be certain that his disciples were few in number. Today the call of Amos: "Let justice flow like water and righteousness like a mighty stream" has become the prayer of mankind.

When Moses proclaimed freedom throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof, only the children of Israel listened and responded. Today, the whole world is deeply involved in this Mosaic proclamation, and its reverberations are being heard and felt on every continent. When Isaiah spoke of international disarmament and painted a glorious picture of the world at peace, his prophecy was but a vision. In our atomic age it has become a necessity. Freedom, justice, and peace, the ancient visions of the prophets of Israel, pulsate with life in this era of new and experimental ways. Faith in the future and hope for man still retain their prophetic reality.

The spiritual inventory so characteristic of Rosh Hashonah is something which we all need. We must carry forward our ancient faith and its illimitable potential for personal religion into the new world setting of our time. Surely a civilization that has penetrated the outer barriers of space can, if it so will, achieve much of spiritual value in our world of today and tomorrow. The vital need of our time is the rediscovery of God in the life of men and of nations. We must strive to shape our lives on the abiding foundations of our faith and live in accord with the eternal ideals of our religious heritage. We must stand by the old truths of religion while we reach out for new experimental ways.

South African Jewry And The Apartheid Policy

BY MAX MELAMET, OF MONTREAL, NATIONAL EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF CANADA

Both within and outside the borders of South Africa, Jewish attitudes to the Verwoerd Government's policy of apartheid have been widely, vigorously, and sometimes acrimoniously discussed.

The great majority of South African Jews was born in that country and its race attitudes have in large measure been shaped by the same social, economic, and intellectual forces which have produced the white gentile's attitudes to color. It is hardly surprising that a Jew who went, in turn, to a South African kindergarten, elementary school, high school, and university should manifest at least some of the traditional preferences and prejudices of the society in which he has grown to maturity.

Among Jews themselves differences in race attitudes are often less the result of differences in temperament, character, and experience than of occupational and geographic factors. The Jew who has grown up in the large cosmopolitan city of Johannesburg tends to differ in his color attitudes from his co-religionist in one of the small, agricultural, Afrikans-speaking villages of the eastern Transvaal.

Between the Jewish employer of black labor in secondary industry and the Jewish employer of labor on a farm there is often a wide divergence of viewpoint. When the Jew from Johannesburg goes to Cape Town for his summer vacation his reaction to the non-segregated public transportation system — it is now rapidly being segregated — comes as a bit of a shock to the Capetonian Jew who has long learned to accept it and who often opposes its abolition.

I hope I shall not be misunderstood if I say that there is sometimes a certain amount of ethnocentric vanity in the question. How can a Jew reconcile anti-black discrimination with the imperishable proclamations of our great prophets? There is, after all, an abundance of commandment in Christianity also to love one's neighbour, to return good for evil, to turn the other cheek, to treat one's fellow human as a brother, but this does not prevent many a faithful church-goer from flatly refusing to worship in the same church as a fellow Christian with a black skin. Many people seem to experience no great difficulty in keeping their religious lives apart from the secular activities, and in putting their religious professions out of their thoughts except when they attend synagogue or church.

The South African scene is a complex one. Although the white man obdurately refuses to share political power with the black, he has, even if not always for the most disinterested of reasons, done a great deal to improve the latter's social and economic conditions. Much remains in this fiercely unequal and repressive society to shock the conscience, but it would be grossly unfair to overlook the fact that the black man's standard of living in South Africa, wretchedly low as it is by comparison with that of the white man, is still higher than possibly anywhere else in the whole of Africa.

Unlike the Belgians, for instance, the white South Africans have built universities and other institutions of higher learning for the blacks, the million and a half Cape Coloureds (mixed breeds) and the Indians. There are in South Africa non-white doctors, lawyers, dentists, administrators, and university professors. The number is lamentably small and some of the present policies of the Verwoerd Government seem to indicate a desire to direct non-white education in "approved directions", but the fact remains that in the field of education the white South African's record can stand comparison with that of the very best white administration on the African continent, and is far better than in all except, perhaps, a very few countries.

In such a situation there is much that the humanitarian can endorse; and where he does not approve, it is possible for him to work hard to raise the black man's material standard of living while conveniently keeping his eyes shut to the black man's demand for equal political rights.

Many Jews are as mistrustful of black nationalism as they are of some of the varieties of white nationalism in South Africa. Moderate African leaders are being effaced from the scene, either by white stupidity and intransigence or by a mounting black militancy.

As in many other national movements in the history of Africa, leadership of black nationalism in South Africa is swinging more and more to the extreme. In some of its current manifestations it is not a progressive, liberating force prepared to co-operate with all people of goodwill, but an expression of black determination to dominate.

That this black militancy has been provoked by white militancy, that white policies have removed from the black man's grasp any possibility of constitutional change by peaceful democratic methods, is cold comfort to one who has willy-nilly to make a choice between the Lumumbas and the Verwoerds. It is becoming inescapably clear that the only choice may be between one extremism and another.

"If it's News - it's in the Star"

THE EICHMANN STORY

BY JOSEPH B. SCHECHTMAN

Karl Adolf Eichmann, a Lieutenant-Colonel in Hitler's SS, head of the Jewish Office of the Gestapo, was last seen a day or two before the capitulation of Germany at Alt-Aussee in Austria. He told his deputy for Slovakia, Greece, and Hungary, SS. Captain Dieter Wisliceny, on May 3, 1945, that he would "take to the maquis with his men" and hide in the mountains, south of his childhood home in Linz, "till the forthcoming conflict between East and West." Somewhat earlier, he spoke of committing suicide together with his wife and children, and boasted that he would "jump into my grave laughing because the fact that I have on my conscience five million lives gives me extraordinary satisfaction."

Eichmann did not become a maquis fighter, nor did he leap into his grave when the day of reckoning came. Instead, he destroyed his personal papers, donned the uniform of a private in the Luftwaffe, the German airforce, and surrendered to an American patrol under the name of Otto Eckman. As a private, he expected to arouse little interest. Later on, when transferred to another prisoner-of-war camp, he admitted being a lieutenant in the Waffen SS the military unit of Hitler's Elite Corps, as distinct from the SS as a whole.

Eichmann stayed in the prisoner-of-war camps for almost a year and a half. Wilhelm Hoette, German counter-intelligence officer, ironically commented that "to this day the American authorities have not realized that the man they had sought so intensely, had all the time been in their hands for months on end." In the second part of 1946, Eichmann escaped from the camp and found refuge in North Germany with the brother of a Nazi trooper he had known, a forest warden. For three years he lived in a wood hut and earned his livelihood by cutting wood.

A search for him was meanwhile going on. Little credence was given to the suicide story. His body, for instance, was never found. Rumors then reported Eichmann to be hiding in Cairo, where he was allegedly recruiting escaped German prisoners for the Arab armies which invaded Israel in 1948; in the oil-rich sheikhdom of Kuwait; and even in Israel, where he was supposed to have returned as a Jew after the creation of the state. Little by little, the search petered out.

In 1950, Eichmann, provided with false papers, left Germany. He made contact with his family in Austria, and his wife and children then joined him in Argentina, his final country of refuge. They lived quietly and modestly. Only a very few trusted old comrades knew his identity and whereabouts. Yet, he told his captors, he felt all along that sooner or later he would be apprehended; in a way, he even felt relieved when this finally happened.

The essential elements of Eichmann's life story have for years been surrounded by legend. It was asserted that he had been born in Palestine, in the German Templar colony at Sarona, and was a student in Herzlia Gymnasium in Tel Aviv. His fair command of Hebrew and Yiddish supported this version.

However, Eichmann's personal file, captured in the SS main office, establishes that he was born at Solingen, in the Ruhr area of West Germany, on March 19, 1906, and grew up in the Austrian town of Linz. He studied for an engineering degree, but had to abandon his studies in 1925, when his father was ruined by the inflation. Six years later, he joined the Austrian Nationalist Party.

In July, 1933, after Hitler's rise to power, he crossed the German border and fourteen months later obtained a minor job in the Berlin head office of the S. D. (security service). His first assignment was the compilation of a card-index on Freemasonry. This was followed by a more responsible position in the office museum, where documentation on Zionism fascinated him. It was probably in this connection that he had acquired the first smattering of Hebrew and Yiddish.

In his "Bréviaire de la Haine" (Breviary of Hate), published in 1951 in Paris, Léon Poliakoff asserts that Eichmann was sent to Palestine in 1937 to establish contact with the Arab anti-Zionist leadership, but was expelled within 48 hours by the British security authorities, whereupon he went to Cairo. There he befriended Haj Amin Husseini, the fugitive Mufti of Jerusalem. Gerald Reitlinger reminds us, however, in his well-documented "Final Solution" that at the time of his alleged Palestine trip Eichmann was merely an obscure sergeant-major in the SS, serving as a Gestapo informer in then still unoccupied Vienna. His friendship and cooperation with the ex-Mufti probably did not start before 1942 when the latter found refuge in Berlin.

Eichmann first came to prominence in August, 1938, when he was put in charge of the Jewish Emigration Office in the recently annexed Vienna. At that time, the Third Reich's Jewish policy did not yet extend to extermination, but was restricted to forced wholesale emigration. Eichmann was an enthusiastic apostle of this policy.

Joel Brand, a leader in the Zionist rescue work in Budapest, who came to know him well in 1944, testifies that "before the war Eichmann favored the wholesale emigration of the Jews. . . . He regarded them as mentally sick, with an infectious malady that made them a public danger. Mass emigration would cleanse Germany of Jews and at the same time would spread 'Jewish infection' among Germany's enemies. Before the war Eichmann negotiated with the Montreal of the 1880's was very proud of its great figure-skating champion, Louis Rubinstein. Born in Montreal in 1861, Rubinstein participated in his first competition at the age of eighteen years when he skated off to the championship of Montreal. From that achievement he moved on to the Canadian championship in 1882 and to North American victory in 1885. Competing with such steady success, Louis Rubinstein next sailed for Europe in January, 1890, to compete in the international tournament of St. Petersburg, Russia.

On his arrival, however, he encountered considerable difficulty. He was a Jew and unwelcome in Czarist Russia. When Rubinstein was summoned to police headquarters one of the members of the skating competition committee accompanied him. He explained that Rubinstein had come to Russia to compete in the international tournament. At this point the interpreter was ordered out of the room and a high Russian police official proceeded to question the Canadian skater, in English.

"You are a Jew?" "Yes," Rubinstein replied, "and proud of it!" "And what is your purpose here in Russia?" "You know as well as I," Rubinstein said sharply.

"I'm here as a sportsman to represent Canada. I ask you to return my passport immediately." "Well, now, we'll see about that, Mr. Rubinstein," fumed the official. "For the time being you may go."

Louis Rubinstein left police headquarters very much disturbed. Was this the treatment he should have expected when the Russian tournament officials invited him to compete? Surely, the Russian authorities would set the matter right. For the next two days Rubinstein practiced for the competition ahead. But on the second day, as he was getting the feel of the rink, he was haled from the ice and summoned to police headquarters. Once again he was put through the Russian interrogation routine.

"Mr. Rubinstein, you are hereby given twenty-four hours to get out of St. Petersburg," the official said sharply. "This is final." "It is not final," Rubinstein retorted. "I've come a long distance from Montreal. Furthermore, I am a British subject and I expect to be treated properly. I shall not leave St. Petersburg unless I'm carried bodily out of your city!"

Immediately Louis Rubinstein made his way to the British Embassy where he was warmly received by Sir Robert Morier, the Ambassador. Rubinstein told Sir Robert what had happened and was told by the Ambassador that "a British subject who comes to Russia, whether Jew or Gentile, to take part in an international match, will be allowed to stay. And if the British Embassy has even slight influence at the Czar's court, you will stay here, Mr. Rubinstein, until you compete."

Louis Rubinstein felt reassured as he left the British Embassy with a special letter of commendation and identification from the Ambassador. Now let the Russian police come after him. Another two days passed and Rubinstein went on with his skating practice. Then shortly after midnight of the third night Rubinstein was routed from his bed by two Russian policemen. Given a few minutes to dress, the riled Montreal sportsman was bustled off once more to St. Petersburg Police headquarters for the third time. Brought before an arrogant Russian official, Louis Rubinstein was again questioned. Once more he stated his purpose in St. Petersburg. He was here to compete in the skating tournament. He then presented for the official's consideration the letter of the British Ambassador.

"Well, you of noble birth," said the official sarcastically in his halting English, "you are obviously under honorable protection and I congratulate you on your good fortune. But let it be clearly understood, Mr. Rubinstein. You are to get out of Russia immediately after the tournament's close. Do we understand each other?" "I do not wish to prolong my stay by one moment," Rubinstein fired back in reply. "Let me get through with the tournament and I shall bid you a quick farewell."

The Russian official smiled with pleasure at Rubinstein's discomfiture. Then taking from his desk the passport which had been taken from Rubinstein on his first appearance before the police, the official crossed out the words "British Subject" replacing it with the words "L. Rubinstein, Jew." "You do me great honor," Rubinstein said as he took the passport back. "And I in turn will show you and all your bigots just what L. Rubinstein, Jew, can do!"

World Refugee Year: Combined Operation To Give Refugees A New Home And A New Life

Address to the Montreal Lakeshore University Women's Club

BY W. A. MCFAUL, DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION OF CANADA

Many people are unaware of the part Canada has played in refugee relief but there is no doubt it has been an important part in relation to our population and to our facilities. The Second World War drew millions of people from their homes, many were cared for and were able to return home when peace came but the Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees estimates that the staggering total of 1,676,000 remained homeless in Western Europe, North Africa, and the Middle East at the beginning of 1946.

The total was made up of a large number of pre-war refugees and many thousands of displaced persons who were unwilling to return to their former country or who could not be repatriated. Canada was one of the first overseas countries to take positive action to help these homeless people.

There has been little publicity about the admission of refugees to this country or about our financial assistance to refugee aid programmes largely because it was felt that the refugees who came to Canada should not be labelled as such or set apart from other immigrants and thus made to feel that they were a strange or different group. We wanted to recognize them as individuals and to offer them every chance for a successful integration into their new homeland. One excellent result of treating these newcomers as ordinary individuals has been that they have settled remarkably well all over the country. Hence we have avoided large numbers of problem cases and the grouping of refugees in one locality with all the demoralization and difficulty.

Immigration is no easy matter even when it is planned and anticipated. Think of the difficulties refugees must overcome when they go to a strange country to start a new life from the beginning and usually without funds or a job. The Honourable Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has paid tribute to them for their success and to all those in government, municipal, and private agencies who helped to make their success possible by receiving them, caring for them, and assisting them to settle. There have been many examples of special effort on both sides and many instances of difficult problems solved by hard work and goodwill.

It should be remembered that refugees are often much harder to place than other immigrants because they have not passed our normal tests of health, training, and general acceptability. A few require long periods of hospitalization available here; language is often a barrier; and the weather is a frequent hazard. Being a major immigration country, Canada has been able to offer refugees one of the most acceptable solutions to their predicament, a new home. Canada has always reacted sympathetically to refugee problems, probably because so many Canadians are immigrants themselves or their parents or grandparents were immigrants.

This country has played a prominent part in the organization and operation of international bodies devoted to the protection, care and resettlement of refugees. As soon as the Second World War ended, Canada initiated a vigorous programme for the reception of refugees. For a few years, there were limitations of what could be done because of the country's transition from war to peace and because demobilized servicemen had first call when transportation was available.

Later there was a serious shortage of hospitals and other welfare institutions for our rapidly growing population. Space was at such a premium that it was impossible to bring into Canada any large group of handicapped refugees who required institutional care.

A popular misconception is that Canada's acceptance of refugees was based primarily on self-interest and that the refugees were required in this country as workers. This is far from the truth. When the majority of these refugees came to Canada, there was an unlimited supply of potential immigrants in Europe from whom Canada could have accepted persons with funds and possessions who might have made a more immediate contribution to Canadian growth than the refugees. The decision to accept refugees was based on humanitarian grounds but, as a matter of fact, these refugees subsequently proved to be a tremendous asset to Canadian economic and social development.

Complete statistics regarding the total number of refugees admitted to Canada since World War II are not available because it has been a feature of Canadian Immigration policy not to distinguish between refugees and other immigrants even though the normal selection criteria for immigrants may have been relaxed considerably on behalf of the refugees. Separate statistics are available for clearly defined movement only, or for those situations where statistics are maintained by international agencies transporting refugees to Canada.

Refugee movements which can can be defined are as follows

Displaced persons, 1947 — 1952	165,697
Polish veterans	4,527
Hungarian refugees, to December 31, 1958	37,566
Stateless persons, 1953 to December 31, 1958	23,158
Total	230,948

It is also true that many other refugees who, at the time of admission to Canada, claimed the citizenship of their country or origin or the nationality of some other country, were not recorded as stateless persons although they were in fact refugees. Good examples are the Yugoslav refugees of whom about 3,500-4,000 have entered Canada annually in recent years, in many cases listing themselves as Yugoslav citizens.

To the total of 230,948, therefore, must be added many thousands more. Among the ordinary immigrants also were those persons who, as refugees, had resided in other countries of first and second asylum. Among the refugees and among the one-half million other immigrants admitted to Canada in this period were many who, for one reason or other, required welfare assistance, sometimes of a continuing nature.

Some refugees will be a continual burden. The vast majority are being assisted by their family or friends; others are in the care of one or other of the welfare agencies who have always cooperated so magnificently in this work; some, particularly those who fell ill after arrival, have been cared for by the welfare agencies of the Provincial or Municipal Governments which have reacted generously whenever their assistance was required.

Among the difficult cases received by Canada without fanfare or publicity were some five percent of the Hungarian refugees who required hospitalization and treatment immediately upon arrival. The number of chronic cases will not be known for some time. Because of the Canadian policy of not concentrating refugees in camps or hostels, this feature of the movement is not always apparent. Because of Canada's sympathetic approach to refugees as individuals, the sum total of financial contributions to the relief of these homeless people is not available.

However, I have some figures which will show Canada's support for various international organizations set up to deal with refugee problems and while they give only part of the total, they are indeed impressive for a country with our population. Canada has made direct contributions of $184,092,000 to these agencies which include: the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, $154,000,000; the International Refugee Organization, $18,815,000; Palestine Refugee Relief and United Nations Relief and Works Agency, $8,791,000.

Identifiable costs of the administration and welfare of refugee in this country since the end of the war come to an additional twenty-four million dollars and thus our minimum contribution to the relief and assistance of refugees and displaced persons in the past fifteen years has exceeded two hundred million dollars.

In 1956, Canadian Immigration officials made a special study of the refugee situation in Europe. From this has resulted the present policy for dealing with these people. Applications may be accepted in Canada from permanent residents of this country for the admission from Europe of any unsettled refugee who is a relative of the sponsor or who is known by him. If the sponsor can provide assurance that the refugee will be looked after and will be found employment, the application is approved.

The refugee, who is examined by Canadian Immigration Officer overseas, must meet the usual civil and medical requirements although sympathetic consideration is given to all cases except when it is impossible to deal with those involving insanity or contagious diseases. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration is prepared to give special consideration to refugees' families, husbands, wives, children, or parents, who have been separated for medical reasons, so long as one working member of the family is a permanent resident of Canada. In such cases, provincial health authorities must be able to accept and treat any persons suffering from a contagious disease or requiring institutional care.

Any refugees in this category who cannot comply with the ordin-

World Jewish Congress Plans New Action In The New Year

BY SAMUEL BRONFMAN, OF MONTREAL, CHAIRMAN OF THE NORTH AMERICAN EXECUTIVE OF THE WORLD JEWISH CONGRESS

The year 5721, upon which we are entering, is of special significance to Jews throughout the world, for it marks the 25th anniversary of the Constituent Assembly of the World Jewish Congress. It also marks the beginning of a new era in our great global organization.

Though it has been in existence only a quarter of a century, the World Jewish Congress has achieved a considerable measure of fame for its handling of matters vital to Jews in many parts of the world.

There was the role of the World Jewish Congress in alerting the world to Hitler's terrifying intentions, followed by the fight to save the hapless refugees who managed to survive the holocaust. Then there was the action of the World Jewish Congress in initiating the discussions that led to the German Reparations Agreement and subsequent payments, involving billions of dollars, to thousands and thousands of individual victims.

As the United Nations came into being, the World Jewish Congress played a role in drafting the Declaration of Human Rights. Today the World Jewish Congress enjoys consultative status at the United Nations and participates in the deliberations of many U. N. organs.

These are but a few of the concrete achievements, the actions and results that are already part of the history of Jewry. But there is much more still to be done. There are new problems demanding a fresh approach.

It is the realization that a new look is necessary that has decided the World Jewish Congress to make some far-reaching changes in recent times. One complete department, the Organization Department, responsible for basic community contact, has now been transferred from New York to Geneva where the World Jewish Congress Director of Coordination also maintains his office.

Another, and more far-reaching, change is the establishment of the North American Division, a grouping initiated in line with the program of action laid down at the recent Plenary Assembly of the World Jewish Congress. We are now implementing this decision and are thus giving weight and substance to our belief that the World Jewish Congress must develop broad representative support in the Americas.

It is my personal desire to interest in the work of the North American Division the Jewish community of America which, physically remote from the scene of much World Jewish Congress action, has not extended to the movement the same solid support evinced by other communities.

To the problems that Jews face in Europe, in Africa, in Latin America and other places of the globe, the World Jewish Congress will, in the New Year ahead, bring refreshing initiative that, together with a reputation for solid achievement, will offer new hope for unity and unified action in all major matters pertaining to Jewry.

Is Canada Ten Different Provinces Or One Country?

Second prize winner of $300 in the national essay contest sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress and Bnai Brith, open to all high school youth in Canada to mark the national bicentenary of Canadian Jewry

BY ROBERT VINEBERG, AGED SIXTEEN YEARS, SON OF PHILIP F. VINEBERG, Q.C., AND MRS. VINEBERG, 32 SUMMIT CRESCENT, MONTREAL, AND A STUDENT AT WESTMOUNT HIGH SCHOOL

The birth of a nation: The month was October, the year, 1789. In his office at Quebec City, Lord Dorchester was writing a letter to Baron William Grenville, the British Secretary of State:

"I have to submit to the wisdom of His Majesty's Councils, whether it may not be advisable to establish a general government for His Majesty's dominions upon this continent, as well as a governor-general, whereby the united exertions of His Majesty's North American Provinces may more effectually be directed to the general interest and to the preservation of the unity of the Empire."

Embodied in this historic letter was the embryo of a nation, a nation of unity. The years passed very swiftly. In rapid succession came the war of 1812, the vast migration westward, and the American Civil War. The time was ripe. Three and one-half million people were ready. Thus, on July 1, 1867, a long-standing dream became reality. Canada was born.

Confederation was actually created of necessity. It was a barrier against the external world, a bulwark protecting Canada from being engulfed by the raging seas surrounding her. Formed in order to brace the scattered provinces against possible American aggression, it was necessary to construct a national economy; to relieve dependence upon the lumber, fur, and fishing industries; and to dull the keen edges of American and British economic policies. Confederation provided for an area of free trade, the development of interprovincial transportation facilities, and the unveiling of vast northern and western regions.

In one effective stroke, it transformed Canada from a weak and powerless infant into a husky and ambitious child. As Georges Etienne Cartier stated, "Shall we be content to remain separate, shall we be content to maintain a mere provincial existence, when, by combining together, we could become a great nation?"

American union by violence, or . . . From the very outset, however, the people of Canada found it difficult to look upon themselves as a unified nation. There were too many differences, too many dividing factors, for the federation to be called true unity.

Canada stretches for 5,780 miles from Newfoundland to British Columbia, in which exist numerous extensive barriers of mountain and hinterland. This geographical bigness has severely hampered the growth of a united nationality.

Sparsity of settlement, the inevitable result of seventeen million people scattered over half a continent, is the first hindering factor in the development of a closely knit community. Equally unfortunate is the division of the country into four populated areas, separated from one another by extensive stretches of wilderness: the Maritime Provinces, the St. Lawrence Valley, the Prairie Provinces, and British Columbia.

In each of these regions, provincial sentiments and prejudices are bred, seriously menacing national unity. It is not easy for people of one area, with local habits and traditions, to closely identify their interests with people of other regions.

However, there has been one favourable geographic factor that has greatly aided the settling and unification of Canada: the St. Lawrence River and Great Lakes system. Stretching from the eastern seaboard into the very heart of the country, this waterway has provided a transcontinental channel of communication from the earliest days of the Indian and the coureur de bois, serving to bind the interests and attitudes of the East to those of the West.

Nevertheless, the question remains. Why would a people, so extensively and so sharply split by physical barriers, unite into a common Confederation? As E. P. Taché, Prime-Minister of the Canadian coalition, sagaciously warned his countrymen in 1865, "Without federation, Canada would be forced into American union by violence, and if not by violence would be placed upon an inclined plane which would carry us there insensibly." And there was the choice: American union by violence, or Canadian union for security.

The Cultural Divorce: "One day he (the French Canadian) found himself abandoned in the presence of a stranger who did not speak his tongue, who did not worship in his way, and who, moreover, was at no pains to conceal the fact that henceforth, it was he who was to be the master. That day Jean Baptiste, letting his gaze wander over the horizon spread out before him, felt clearly and strongly that this was his home, and that no power, no arrogance, no astuteness could alter the fact that these houses, these fields, these churches, these roads belonged to him, and to him alone." — M. Louis Durant.

Wilfrid Laurier once prophesied that federal union would be the tomb of the French race and the ruin of Lower Canada. While the federal system successfully opened a path for a wider nationality in Canada, the co-operation which it has sponsored has at times been subjected to severe strain by the violent clash of opinions between the French and British.

Of the four original provinces that entered Confederation, the population of three was substantially Anglo-Saxon, while the fourth, Quebec, was solidly French, divorced from its neighbours by barriers of race, language, and religion. The common bonds of British tradition that bound the other provinces held little meaning for the fiercely nationalistic Frenchman.

The French-English cleavage thus formed is one of the greatest factors in Canadian disunion, not only because it is a racial and linguistic cleavage, but because it sponsors similar cleavages of economy, culture, philosophy, law, and religion.

What French Canada was in 1867 it remains substantially today. It still cherishes beliefs, customs, and institutions which have little hold on the English provinces. The French Canadian of today tenaciously preserves his identity, constantly resisting assimilation and English dominance.

An excellent illustration is the infrequency of communication between these two peoples in Canada's largest city, Montreal, in which approximately 59% of the population is French and 35% is English. Here, if anywhere, is ample scope for association, but in fact the two groups stay apart and distinct, except where business and politics force them together.

Possessing their own residential sections, their own shopping centres, and their own social groups, the French Canadians remain adamantly aloof, clinging to their church and their provincial government for guidance and tutelage, and continuously barricading their fortifications against the often imaginary forces of assimilation and homogeneity.

However, the situation is not as grave as it might appear at first. As Professor Frank Scott has pointed out, "The French Canadian in a real sense is the truest Canadian. He has lived on the soil for three hundred years, and the family ties with another world have long been broken. To Canada alone does he feel attached, for England conquered him and France first deserted him and then travelled a political and spiritual road his clergy have taught him to abhor. He sees no help coming from without, he knows he must build upon his own resources."

Thus the French people have become an integral part of Canada. Although they remain isolated in language and customs, they have assumed the stature of true and loyal Canadians. Gone are the days when any serious body in Quebec yearns for an independent republic on the banks of the St. Lawrence. There are differences aplenty about federal-provincial matters, about securing what Mr. Duplessis used to call "autonomy" for the provinces, but there is no questioning the attachment of the French Canadian to his home, his people, and his country.

The internal financial difficulties: The financial relations and problems between the Dominion and the provinces have been one of the greatest sources of disagreement since the signing of Confederation. Due to the rapid growth and expansion of Canada, the financial provisions for the provinces as outlined in the British North America Act soon became entirely inadequate, and even after seventy years of haggling, they have not yet been satisfactorily ironed out.

Actually, the core of the matter lies in the rapid growth of the responsibilities of government since the turn of the century. Provincial demands for governmental assistance are multiplying immensely.

When the shofar sounds

In the days of the shepherds on the slopes of Sinai, the ram's horn called the sheep back to the flock.
Today as Jews everywhere turn back to a contemplation of the age-old truths first proclaimed by the prophets and then given to the world, we join with them in the greeting that they be "inscribed for a New Year"... a year of health, happiness and prosperity.

Wanted: Selfless Concern For The Welfare Of Others

BY RABBI HERBERT C. DOBRINSKY, OF BETH ISRAEL SYNAGOGUE, HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA; SON OF MR. AND MRS. VICTOR DOBRINSKY, 5334 SNOWDON AVENUE, MONTREAL

This past year marked the 200th anniversary of the "Baal Shem Tov," Israel of Miedziboz, the founder of Neo-Chassidism, a stirring religious movement which swept Europe some two centuries ago and still flourishes with vitality today. Despite the overt objections of the Rabbanites of that epoch to Chassidism, the inspiring piety of the Baal Shem (Besht) and his captivating fervor of prayer as he communicated the depths of his soul to the Heavenly Master, attracted a multitude of followers whose hearts, minds, and lives became enwrapped in Chassidism.

The magnetic attribute of "The Master of the Good Name" was his altruistic and selfless concern for the welfare of others. This "outwardness" and an unabounding love for his fellow man characterized the Baal Shem. It evolved from a profound insight into the minds of men and a deep understanding of human needs and human behaviour.

With this calibre of selfless leadership to emulate, the Chassidism enjoyed a spirit of brotherhood and community which was both genuine and meaningful. Within the Chassidic community the spirit of mutual dependence and mutual responsibility deepened their faith in the Lord and man. The revived esprit de corps of these pietists engendered within them new hope, courage, and security.

The annals of Chassidic lore provide a reservoir of inspiring teachings which illustrate the dynamic impact of the Baal Shem upon his generation. They depict a colorful canvas of Jewish life in the 18th century, reflecting brilliant rays of light and joy which pierced through the depths of darkness and gloom. The Master Painter is the Besht who through example of piety and outwardness has created a new vibrant and meaningful design for living, bringing new happiness to a large segment of Jewry.

One such inspiring scene portrays the Baal Shem standing outside the Synagogue on the High Holy Days, adamantly refusing to enter its portals. When prevailed upon by his followers to explain his reluctance to enter the Synagogue, he answered, "I refuse to enter because there are too many prayers in the Synagogue and not enough coming out."

One need not be committed to the Chassidic movement nor even respond emotionally to the lingering sentimentality conveyed by the portrait of piety and enchantment of religious spirit which characterizes Chassidism, to appreciate the above account. Enshrined therein is a potent, timely message for Jews of every religious persuasion to consider seriously during these solemn days as we stand upon the threshold of a New Year.

Most Jews will enter their respective Houses of Worship to communicate with their Maker and to express prayers of thanksgiving and petition to Him, the Divine Judge, on these High Holy Days. The spirit of the season summons us to Cheshbon Hanefesh, to take stock of our past deeds with the ultimate goal of self-amelioration.

While we search the depths of our souls and attempt to fathom the innermost precincts of our hearts, it would serve us well to recognize that the hallmark of our times is egocentricity and blatant self-centeredness. Even the spirit of our repentance reflects the milieu of our age as we beat our breasts in contrition to the tempo of the times. So many of our prayers are locked in the Synagogue, pronounced for selfish reasons, uttered for our own personal welfare, meaningful to ourselves alone.

Too few of our petitions and resolutions contain the spiritual dimension of outwardness, of altruism. Not enough of our avowed ambitions are directed toward the community, are motivated by our concern for our fellow men in local and national life. Not enough of our prayers come out of the Synagogue. It is truly ironic and incongruous that an era called the "space age" inspires an outwardness reaching to the furthermost points of the celestial hemispheres and yet reflects an earthly spirit of inwardness and selfishness. Our year-round activities in the community indicate most clearly that our prayers were left in the Synagogue at the conclusion of the Neilah Service on Yom Kippur and our apathy and lack of participation in worthy communal endeavors is the sad proof that not enough prayers came out of the Synagogue.

For many Jews the efficacy of prayer as a stimulant to consecrated action has waned and become impotent. For a large majority of our present-day worshippers, the span of their interests and the scope of their prayers is circumscribed by their immediate family circle. To them, communion with their larger self, the local and national Jewish community is an unknown experience.

It is true that our bond of brotherhood with the State of Israel and Jews in other troubled countries of the globe is manifested when a disturbing crisis arises. We become one with the Jewish community, expressing shared concern when a wave of anti-Semitism rages across a country, but as soon as the outbursts of hatred are abated, the floods of general apathy and complacency for community welfare drown our enthusiasm.

Even the startling but true realization that our lives are inextricably bound up with those of our fellow men is not enough to urge us onward in an effort to solve many imminent problems which face our own communities and those on a national level. We stand in contrition on the High Holy Days, praying for a higher standard of living, when, as Jews committed to the teachings of Torah, we should be praying for a higher standard of life.

Thus, the revived image of the Baal Shem Tov whose two hundredth anniversary coincides with the bi-centenary of Jewish Life in Canada calls upon us to become more community-minded. And in many ways this is the time-hallowed message of the High Holy Day season. Our prayers of the Machzor are phrased in the plural form. We do not petition, "Inscribe me in the Book of Life" but rather "Inscribe us in the Book of Life." Our confessional reads "We have sinned, we have transgressed", denoting our mutual responsibility for the welfare of each other. This is a cardinal concept which has ever strengthened Judaism and it is a genuine expression of concern for the entire community of Israel, not merely the majestic form of "we."

Our group recitation of the confessional prayer reveals the cogent fact that the failure of the individual is often due to the failure of his society or community. The self can fulfill its full potential only in society, only within the community, and thus man can only fulfill all of his duties to our Heavenly Father when his actions are directed toward, and enacted with, and on behalf of, the community.

As Jews, we have always believed that our successes and failures, our achievements and losses, are shared by our brethren. The plurality of responsibility expressed in our prayers illustrates that the community of Israel takes precedence over our individuality. The Jewish community is the rampart of Israel.

The battle against assimilation must be staged in all Jewish communities in Canada, both large and small, scattered and central, as an organized and co-ordinated effort. The enrichment and revitalization of Jewish education and our sacred tradition for communities which are deprived of the necessary religious leadership and instruction, must be the concern of every Jew in this Dominion. All Israel is one body, and each Jew is a member or organ of that totality.

The infecting germ of ignorance is rampant and must be combatted by each of us as an interested and integral part of the Jewish community. Since we are all part of the body of Israel, none can claim immunity in the face of this cancerous malady. Scattered communities must join forces, manifold organizations must join ranks and unite as one to study and investigate the imminent dangers to our spiritual stability.

The required insight to ward off disintegration and deterioration of the Jewish body and soul is born of outwardness and selflessness. It is spontaneously generated when we carry our prayers out of the Synagogue and transform them into consecrated deeds in the community during the year.

May the Almighty grant the fulfillment of our petitions and may He inscribe all Israel in the Book of Life. May your Book of Life include many pages devoted to communal activity and the fortification of the Jewish Community.

ham and his son Isaac, a devotion absent from the lives of other members of the human family, God proclaims, "Inasmuch as thou hast done this thing . . . I will indeed bless thee . . . and through thy children will all the nations of the earth be blessed."

Redemption will come in Nisan. Through the liberation of the forces which have shaped the destiny of Israel, all mankind will achieve its greatest blessings, freedom from the fear of atomic annihilation, and the opportunity to develop in the service of justice and peace for all.

IS CANADA TEN DIFFERENT PROVINCES OR ONE COUNTRY?

Education has always been regarded as a public responsibility in Canada, but to it have been added provisions for the unemployed, the sick, and the aged. The financial burdens on provincial governments have consequently been extremely heavy, for it is on them that these duties fall under the constitution. Their taxing powers, on the other hand, are narrowly limited.

The expectation of the Fathers of Confederation was that, the large national functions, as they were then understood having been transferred to the Dominion, and the provinces being charged only with local affairs, the revenue requirements of the latter would be small. While therefore the Dominion was given almost unlimited power to tax, the provinces were confined to "direct" taxes.

It was indeed hoped that they would not even have to resort to these, and that they would find the subsidy payments (which had been allotted to them as compensation for the customs and excise duties surrendered to the Dominion) and the revenues from Crown lands sufficient to meet their needs. Just how extensive the change has been is shown by the fact that the average per capita expenditure of provincial governments, which was $1.34 in 1871, by 1956 had risen to $98.50.

It has been noted that "economically, Canada can be compared to a string of beads, and they are not all pearls." From the chronically depressed, unstable economy of the Maritimes, through the highly diversified and booming economy of Quebec and Ontario, to the great untapped potential of the Prairie Provinces and British Columbia, the wide differences of products, outlets, and markets are bound to cause much conflict and argumentation. Two good examples are the prairie wheat farmers' continuous protestations and pleas to Ottawa concerning price supports and compensation for crop failures, and the current fiasco between federal authorities and Quebec over Dominion educational grants.

With little appreciable attempt having been made by the responsible parties to solve them, these problems have worsened drastically within the past few decades. It is obvious that they are the chief cause in the severe rift in the unity of Canada. Thus the broad scale of government expenditure and the continually rising taxes to support it, makes all the more imperative the necessity of a clear division of taxing authority between federal and provincial governments.

A solution: Like a highly complicated illness, Canada's problems cannot be solved by a single injection of painkiller. It takes much careful medication to heal the old hurts, and many preventive measures to protect against the occurrence of new ones.

Perhaps the most practical solution to Canada's financial and economic problems would be the centralization of the social services under a single national control. This field at present resembles a no man's land, into which federal grants overflow to mingle with provincial money in an effort to override the hinderances of the British North America Act, falling far short of the efficient and conclusive treatment that is necessary. In favour of this move would be the economies of administrative costs that would be effected, and the forceful and nation-wide steps that the Dominion could make, which the provinces acting individually would be unable to reproduce.

Of course, there are also substantial arguments against greater centralization. There is a certain danger of creating friction between federal and provincial authorities over the re-allocation of jurisdictions. Then too, with regard to Canada's vast area, it could be argued that the country is too large and unwieldy to administer from a central office, and that the needs and requirements of the individual would be lost to generalization.

Therefore, the issue is not one that can be solved hastily. Involved are all the problems of culture, concepts, and traditions that have hampered similar steps in the past. But even though a radical move such as this one may necessitate a complete revision of certain sections of the British North America Act, and although its effects may run contrary to the beliefs of many, a swift solution is absolutely essential, for the future economic welfare of a nation and its people is at stake.

"A mare usque ad mare" (from sea to sea): These are the problems of Canadian unity. The great expanse of territory and extensive physical barriers, the cultural and racial differences, predominantly a French-English clash, and the troublesome and complicated economic problems existing between the Dominion and the provinces, have all combined to divorce the provinces from one another.

But how can this group of widely separated people with different attitudes, backgrounds, and cultures be called a unified nation? Why have they remained as one through trouble and hardship?

The answer lies in the basic driving force that incited the Fathers of Confederation to sign their historic pact ninety-three years ago. The Dominion of Canada was a creation of faith. It was established by men convinced that a union of four important colonies in British North America would serve, not merely the existing necessities of common defence and economic development, but also the future needs of a new nation.

This is why Canada is a unified nation today. We look not to the past, torn by strife and argument, but to the future, filled with promise and expectation. It is true that Canada is made up of ten different provinces. But it is also true that Canada is one country, a country unified in outlook and hope, a country that truly stretches "A mare usque ad mare."

ary immigration health requirements are granted temporary entry for treatment with permanent admission to follow after a cure has been effected. Refugee families who have been prevented from obtaining visas because a member of the family is physically disabled are also considered sympathetically, provided there is reasonable assurance that the breadwinner of the family will be able to obtain employment in Canada.

Other disabled refugees are considered for admission to Canada provided a responsible agency or individual in this country is prepared to undertake full sponsorship and to assume continuing responsibility for the refugees' care and settlement in the community.

The following voluntary agencies have been given the privilege of sponsoring European refugees for admission into Canada: The Canadian Christian Council for the Resettlement of Refugees; The Canadian Council of Churches; The Rural Settlement Society of Canada (Catholic Immigrant Services); The Canadian Jewish Congress; the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

This brings the record up to date. Now we are engaged in World Refugee Year, a dramatic effort sponsored by the United Nations to clear the European Camps and to rehabilitate all the hard-core refugees. Many of these refugees have known no other home for years. Among them are children who were born in the camps and who have never had homes as we know them. These people have no chance for a decent life if we do not take them from the narrow confines of their present existence. We cannot better demonstrate our religious and democratic ideals than by helping our fellow-men in their distress.

World Refugee Year has been planned as a combined operation of governments, private agencies, church groups, and individuals to give these refugees a new home and a new life. You are aware, of course, that refugees have already arrived in Canada. As a matter of fact, an aircraft reached Montreal on New Year's Eve and I am very happy to say that the refugees were well received and have been assigned to homes and hospitals. It is expected that this movement will enable between four hundred and five hundred refugees to leave the camps in Europe and come to Canada.

The Federal Government will bear the whole expense of transportation and of the maintenance of any of these families who need support until they settle into Canadian life. The expenses of treatment in hospitals and sanatoria will be a matter to be arranged with the provinces. In addition to this group of one hundred tubercular refugees and their families which the Federal Government is sponsoring, it is hoped and expected that there will be many additional refugees brought over under other Canadian sponsorship.

We must begin by curing the sick and helping the disabled for illness and disablement are the principal reasons that most European refugees remain in camps. That means hospital space or special care must be provided in Canada. You are aware that practically all the hospitals and similar institutions in this country come under the jurisdiction of the provinces and, to some extent, of private agencies. The over-all number of sick refugees that can be accepted in Canada will be determined by the number of beds which can be allocated and financed in the hospitals, sanatoria, and other institutions. Thus any individual or group who wishes to sponsor a sick or disabled refugee will have to plan for this aspect of his care. Once a sick member of the family is assured of medical care, we can bring a whole family group out of the refugee camp to a hopeful new future in Canada.

Previously I mentioned that refugees, both the healthy and the disabled, are admissible to Canada provided an individual or an approved agency is prepared to sponsor the newcomers. It is hoped that the lead given by the Federal Government in sponsoring one hundred tubercular refugees and their families will be followed by many other Canadians in sponsoring other refugees. It would be difficult to find a more rewarding project for a church group or a private agency than the sponsorship of a refugee during World Refugee Year.

In all such cases, the Federal Government will waive the usual immigration requirements. The sponsor will be expected to arrange for travelling expenses, institutional care, and the integration of the family into the community. This will indicate the necessity for careful organization and planning on the part of the prospective sponsors.

We must never forget that these refugees are real people with even greater needs for affection and recognition than ourselves. It will not be enough to treat them as so many patients to be cured and reported as statistics. They must be accepted fully into our community life and given every chance to become happy and productive Canadians. It is particularly important for families who are awaiting the return of a parent from hospital that they should be accepted as a community responsibility and assisted to a normal place in Canadian life.

The Canadian Committee for World Refugee Year has been established to coordinate as much as possible the activities of all Canadians who wish to see the humanitarian purposes of World Refugee Year fulfilled. We know that the committee is counting on the thoughtful interest of many individuals and groups throughout the country and that they would welcome a demonstration of solidarity and support. This summary shows how active an interest Canada has taken, and continues to take, in the fate of the millions of people driven from their homes by the Second World War and its aftermath.

For a country with our population and with our available facilities for institutional care, our contribution, both in money and in the reception of refugees, has been significant. We are convinced that Canadians will continue to play their full part in the support of international agencies for refugees' relief and in the provision of new homes for the homeless. Many letters have been received by the Honourable, Mrs. Ellen Fairclough, the Minister, expressing approval of the action taken by the Federal Government. However, a significant number of correspondents hold the view that more could be done.

In a movement such as this, involving the expenditure of public funds for purely humanitarian or charitable purposes, the role of the government is to give a lead. The contribution of the Federal Government, on the other hand, need not in itself be the sum total of what can be done towards the alleviation of the refugee problem. Many other avenues are open to private individuals and organizations who justly feel that they have a duty to help these unfortunate people.

A little booklet entitled "Admission of Refugees to Canada during World Refugee Year" shows how individuals, groups, or agencies can make it possible for refugees to start a new life in our country by accepting the responsibilities of sponsors, or by contributing money towards the cost of transportation of needy refugees who are not eligible for transportation assistance from other sources. I wish to make it absolutely clear that the Federal Government has set no limit upon the number of refugees, with the exception of those suffering from mental disorders, who may be admitted under sponsorship. It does seem that in the field of sponsorship by responsible persons and organizations, Canadians can make a most important contribution to World Refugee Year.

Now, quite apart from the responsibilities of full sponsorship or monetary contributions towards the facilitation of admission of needy refugees, individuals and organizations alike can give valuable help in several ways. For example, organizations or individuals whose financial resources may be limited can co-operate with the municipal authorities or with field officers of the Immigration Branch in finding employment or a home for a refugee or a refugee family, or in obtaining clothing and other necessities for them, especially during the first few months of their arrival.

Women's organizations might find it possible to arrange for some of their members to initiate refugee housewives to shopping or to guide them through what is inevitably for newcomers the bewildering process of settling in a strange country. Above all, they can invite refugees to their homes occasionally and give them the warm feeling of "belonging" which is so vitally important. In truth, the measure of assistance that individuals can give to achieve the profoundly human goal of World Refugee Year in Canada ought to know no other limitations than their imagination and goodwill.

Despite repeated efforts at clarification, there still appears to exist widespread misunderstanding with regard to sponsorship. It is my hope that as the result of meetings such as this, misconceptions will disappear and that full advantage will be taken of sponsorship to bring refugees to Canada. Most of the difficulties seem to stem from the reasonable and appropriate requirement that sponsors should assume full and continuing responsibility for the refugees whom they sponsor.

What does this mean? It means that an individual or an organization sponsoring a refugee must pay the cost of his transportation, provide a home, and find employment for him, and help the refugee to make the necessary social adjustment. If the refugee suffers from an illness which will require institutional care, the sponsor must obtain the approval of the provincial authorities and make such financial arrangements for hospitalization costs as the provincial authorities may require. As a natural corrollary, if the sick refugee is the head of family, the sponsor must accept the responsibility for the subsistence and welfare of the family until the breadwinner is well again.

These requirements pre-suppose that the sponsor, be it an individual or an organization, is reliable and financially able to carry out the responsibilities undertaken. The Federal Government has no alternative but to ask that sponsors undertake the responsibilities just mentioned. The welfare assistance of refugees who might become indigent because the sponsor has failed to live up to his undertaking is the responsibility of the provincial and municipal authorities, and it is only equitable that the Federal Government should not be the cause of unreasonable financial burdens falling upon the provinces and municipalities, particularly since sponsored immigrants are not subject to the normal selection criteria.

Lest the responsibility of sponsors should loom as a deterrent to goodwill, it is comforting to know from the experience of my department that the average period during which the sponsor may expect to bear the full measure of the responsibility undertaken is about one year and frequently, much less. Some misunderstanding appears to have occurred with regard to the immigration status of sponsored refugees on arrival in Canada. There is really no cause for concern here. Refugees who are in good health are immediately granted the status of "landed" immigrants; in other words, admitted for permanent residence.

Ailing refugees who suffer from a disease which prohibits their admission as immigrants are admitted for treatment as "non-immigrants" in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act. As soon as they are able to comply with medical requirements, they receive the status of "landed" immigrants.

Representations have beeen received in my department in relation to the refugees or refugee families by organizations other than church agencies. Persons who may wish to sponsor refugees otherwise than through a church organization may obtain assistance in identifying refugee families through the auspices of the Canadian Committee for World Refugee Year. This devoted group of citizens has agreed to obtain on behalf of responsible sponsors the names and other characteristics of refugees in Europe.

In a movement of this complexity it is perhaps not too surprising that some misunderstandings should have occurred. I am sure that following the detailed examination of all phases and implications of sponsorship, in which Immigration Branch personnel will be only too pleased to be of assistance, all points of doubt will be resolved.

It now remains for me to say that the Federal Government, and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in particular, is extremely grateful for the help which voluntary organizations have so consistently given to enable the tragic victims of the cruel folly of war to hope and live again in a country where freedom and dignity of the individual are more than vain words. Welfare agencies are rising once again to still another challenge. That they will give continuing proof of their humanitarianism by giving their fullest support to the work of World Refugee Year, we have no doubt whatsoever.

That they will thus enhance the reputation of Canada as a land of hospitality is not only our hope but our confident expectation. Speaking personally, I shall never forget the wonderful reception which was given to the refugees who arrived at Montreal Airport, Dorval, on New Year's eve. Prior to the arrival of the aircraft, I was literally swamped with offers of assistance from the Montreal Lakeshore University Women's Club and individuals of the Lakeshore and Montreal District and I am sure that in the audience here are some who formed the calvacade of station-wagons and automobiles in which the sixty-nine refugees were conveyed to homes and hospitals on that day.

This spontaneous action on your part, in addition to your having supplied furniture, food, and other necessities of life, is an indication that your hearts are very big indeed. Your attendance here is a further testimony of your willingness to help us to help the refugees to help themselves. May our joint efforts be crowned with success.

This is the real confrontation in South Africa; white extremist versus black extremist. The moderate's influence has been narrowly circumscribed by the events of the past decade or so. He knows that unless there is economic chaos or outside intervention, white extremism is unlikely to be ousted and replaced by more yielding leadership. The only alternative may be black extremism, and if a choice is unavoidable, he will side with the whites. Black extremists have always believed that this is what will happen when the chips are down.

The agony of the moderate in South Africa, whatever his colour, race or creed, is that his fate may be decided by extremists.

It could become very unpleasant for Jews if these white extremists were to believe that the Jewish community, as such, had thrown in its lot with the blacks. They would regard this as desertion to the enemy. In an embittered country like South Africa, where the Afrikaner believes that he has his back to the wall, that he is fighting desperately for his survival, spiritual, cultural, and physical survival, the consequences for the Jew could be disastrous if, when "the defenders of white civilization" were bidden to stand up and be counted, he were to declare himself to be on the side of the blacks.

Many Jews, moreover, have a genuine sympathy for the Afrikaner's struggle, for a small nation's fight against tremendous odds to preserve what it believes to be its right of self-determination, its right to live its own life. They know that the white man's record in South Africa has its glorious chapters also. They know that many Afrikaners see a parallel between their struggle in South Africa and the Jew's struggle first in Palestine and now in Israel.

And yet it is the simple truth that the number of Jews in the liberal movements and organisations in South Africa is, in proportion to their percentage of the white population, the highest. The anti-Semites have not failed to exploit this situation, and conservative Jews have not neglected to offer placatory explanations. This is not said sneeringly.

No one has a right to be sanctimoniously critical of South African Jewish leaders. Their dilemmas are very real. Many of those accused of cowardice by critics thousands of miles away have proven their courage on the battlefields of World War II. They are not afraid for themselves, but for the community they have been selected to guide, and preserve.

The Jews of South Africa are just ordinary men and women. Some support the black national movements, some are as extreme as any white man in South Africa, the overwhelming majority rather uneasily seek accommodations and solutions between the two extremes. Many, of course, are not politically minded at all. They are fully occupied with their own problems of making a living, educating their children, finding happiness inside and outside the home. Many work devotedly for the amelioration of the black man's living conditions but carefully avoid becoming involved in radical programs.

One often hears the question asked: Why do the Jews not get out and away from strife-torn South Africa? Some have done so, although most of those who have left in the past twelve months, made their plans to emigrate long before Sharpeville. English-speaking whites have also left and so have some Afrikaans-speaking whites.

But the Jew loves South Africa. It is his birthplace, he has sunk roots deep there, it has been good to him, and he believes that it is there that he must hammer out his future. This, of course, will remain true only so long as there is a glimmer of hope for the moderate white in South Africa.

At the present time, most South African moderates believe that common sense will at the last moment assert itself, and that the problem of peaceful and prosperous co-existence in South Africa will be solved. All whites (Jew and gentile alike) may have to learn that such a solution will not be found until they are prepared to make the economic and political sacrifices necessary to give the black man some hope of equality.

They will have to learn that it is impossible in the long run to eat one's cake and to have it, too. But certainly at the present time there has been no abandonment of hope. It would be a sad day for millions of men and women of all races in South Africa if hope were abandoned.

Zionist leaders towards the acceleration of such a mass emigration."

Eichmann did not even object to the Jewish influx into Palestine and collaborated actively with the emissaries of the various Zionist groups who were organizing "illegal immigration."

Eichmann's strategy was to force the Vienna Jewish Kultusgemeinde to mobilize foreign exchange holdings from rich Jews in order to finance the emigration of their poorer brethren. Reinhardt Heydrich, then head of the Reich's Security Police, boasted that eight months after the Anschluss, 45,000 Jews had left Austria as against only 19,000 in the "Old Reich."

In July, 1939, Eichmann — by that time promoted to the rank of captain — was transferred to Prague to head the branch of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration in the German Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia. In Prague, as in Vienna, he worked through the Jewish Community Council, which was obliged to provide both the daily quota of emigrants and their capitation fees. The announced goal was the emigration of 70,000 Jews within a year.

When the Council protested that its funds had been blocked, Eichmann threatened to seize 300 Jews a day, street by street, and dispatch them to the concentration camps at Dachau and Merkelgruen where "they will become very keen on emigration." One way or another the money was forthcoming. Within six months, some 35,000 Jews had left the Protectorate. Given exit permits, they were dumped at various European ports. Thousands were put aboard German ships with bogus Latin-American visas or with forged British certificates for Palestine. Some were left to roam the high seas on end.

Under Eichmann's "auspices" — and under duress — a total of 80,000 left Austria and Czechoslovakia. As it turned out, they thus escaped being gassed in Auschwitz by order of the same Adolph Eichmann.

In the early years of the war, emigration outlets became practically non-existent. The Reich's emigration scheme was supplanted first by ghettoization and deportation to the East, and later by wholesale extermination. On May 20, 1941, Eichmann's office, IVA, 4b of RSHA (Reichssicherheitshauptamt — main security office), informed all German consulates that voluntary emigration by Jews from occupied France and Belgium was banned and that "the final solution of the Jewish problem" was close at hand. On July 30, Eichmann's office was officially charged with taking measures "for the final solution of the Jewish question in the European territories under German influence."

In the course of the next four years, Eichmann attended to this job with unrelenting zeal, devotion, and energy. In a character sketch, written in November, 1946, Rudolf Hoess, former commander of the notorious Auschwitz death camp, wrote:

"Eichmann was obsessed with the Jewish question and its final solution. . . . He was agile, active and full of energy, always scheming and on the lookout for innovations and improvements."

Eichmann's was basically a one-man job. He rarely confided in anyone, never signed an order or made a requisition in writing. All communications were either verbal or by teletype. His filing cabinet was his extraordinary memory, sometimes refreshed by a few hastily scribbled memo slips which he alone was able to decipher.

Shortly after the Reich embarked on the "Final Solution," Eichmann came to Auschwitz to discuss with Hoess new and effective methods of mass annihilation. He was worried because all extermination devices used previously — mass shooting, gas vans, carbon monoxide asphyxiation — were obviously inadequate for the physical destruction of millions of Jews in the short span contemplated. New methods would have to be found, he insisted.

Very soon, Auschwitz was equipped with five crematoria capable of reducing to ashes ten thousand human bodies per day. Each transport was preceded by a teletype from Eichmann containing the standard formula: "To be treated in accordance with directives for special treatment" (Sonderbehandlung — the code name for gassing). And Eichmann alone was permitted to keep records of the scope of his extermination action.

According to his own report to Himmler, the number of Jews he "dealt with" was two and one-half million. And he was prepared for many more. When the onrushing

Soviet armies occupied Auschwitz, they found cans of the deadly insecticide Zyklon B. in sufficient quantities to gas twenty million people!

There was nothing bestial or demoniacal in the appearance of this Grand Exterminator. In an early photograph, probably taken around 1934, when Eichmann first joined the S.D., he exhibits the "baby face" of an earnest student. Ten years later, when Joel Brand had the opportunity "to take a close look at the man" in Budapest, he found little of significance. "He might have been an office clerk in a business firm," writes Brand. He describes Eichmann as a man of medium height, slim build, with fair hair, a small face, thin lips, and sharp nose. "Only his eyes were unusual — steely, blue, hard and sharp, they seemed to bore through me. I shall never forget these eyes."

Also unusual was Eichmann's manner of speech. He spoke in short, sharp, clipped sentences, rapping out a few words and then pausing. "When he spoke," says Brand, "it reminded me of the clatter of a machine."

Others have described Eichmann as a sociable, affable, talkative bon-vivant, a boastful, hard-drinking man who kept a smart mistress. In everyday life he was undistinguishable from any other Nazi official. He married a plain little woman with whom he had four children. Though there was no known racial blemish on his Aryan escutcheon, his features were strikingly "Semitic," and his colleagues often teased him on his "Jewish" appearance. Psychologists may indulge in speculations as to whether Eichmann did not choose the role of a Grand Exterminator as a form of "compensation" for this freakish trick of nature.

Though always anxious to remain unknown to the world at large, Eichmann first emerged in the limelight in the spring of 1944, when he came to Budapest with his special Einsatzcommando. On April 25, he summoned Joel Brand and made him this proposition:

"I am prepared to sell you one million Jews. Not the whole lot — you wouldn't be able to raise enough money for that. But you could manage a million. Blood for money: money for blood. You can take them from any country you like, wherever you can find them. From Hungary, Poland, the eastern provinces, from Terezin, from Oswiecim — wherever you will. Whom do you want to save? Men who can beget children? Women who can bear them? Old people? Children? . . . We want goods, however, not money. . . . I want you to go abroad and get in touch with your people and with representatives of the Allied powers. . . . When we have reached an agreement, you can rely on us to perform our part of the bargain with our usual German thoroughness."

A few days later, Eichmann specified his proposal:

"You deliver me one army truck for every hundred Jews. . . . That makes a total of ten thousand trucks. . . . If you want to make a further deal on the side, fill the trucks with a few thousand tons of tea, coffee, soap, and similar commodities. You can rest assured that we'll give you a decent price for them. . . . I can give your Allies a definite assurance, on my word of honor, that these trucks will not be used in the West. They are required exclusively for the Eastern front. . . . If you return and tell me that the offer has been accepted, I will close Oswiecim and bring ten percent of the promised million to the frontier. You can take one hundred thousand Jews away, and afterward bring me one thousand trucks. We'll go on like that. A thousand trucks for every hundred thousand Jews. You can't ask for anything more reasonable than that."

Joel Brand felt that "now Eichmann wished to revert to his original idea of a wholesale emigration." But he was at loss to understand the motives behind the proposal. "Had Eichmann already seen the hand-writing on the wall? Was he trying to secure a general pardon for himself and his friends?" Whatever the explanation, Brand decided to go to Constantinople where he could approach qualified representatives of the Jewish Agency.

Eichmann gave him up to two weeks to return with a definite decision and "then I'll blow up Oswiecim, and the people I am deporting today will be sent to the Spanish frontier as the first consignment of those I have promised you." "But," he added, "I warn you, Herr Brand, that you must not stay away too long. I can't just put your Jews on ice."

When Brand begged him not to resume deportations while the negotiations were going on abroad, the answer was, "I know my own business. I must get tough with you Jews. If I behave like a softy now, your people will think that they are safe anyway, and we'll never reach any agreement."

Noticing that Brand was eyeing the revolver holster that lay on the table, Eichmann leaned back and smiled sarcastically: "I often think how glad some of your people would be to bump me off. But don't be too optimistic, Herr Brand. . . . It may be that we shall lose the war, but you won't catch me or my family. No, I have made all arrangements against that eventuality."

Brand left for Constantinople. (His frustrating experience has been described in the book, "Desperate Mission: Joel Brand's Story, by Alex Weissberg.) He found little understanding and cooperation among most Jewish Agency leaders. He was detained by the British in Cairo, where he was advised to go, and was sent from pillar to post through the intricate maze of Jewish and non-Jewish bureaucracy. He begged to be allowed to return to Budapest, fearing that, enraged by his absence, Eichmann would renew mass annihilation, but he was prevented from doing so.

Eichmann, indeed, had already on June 9 told Dr. Rudolph Kastner, who took over negotiations on behalf of the Budapest Rescue Council, that if there was no answer from Brand within three days, he would "let the mills grind in Auschwitz." The hapless Kastner then submitted a new proposal — the purchase of 100,000 Jews for five million Swiss francs.

Eichmann's counter proposal was to "keep on ice" at an Austrian labor camp 30,000 physically fit Jews at the price of 200 pounds a head, in addition to the cost of their maintenance. Actually, only enough money was raised to preserve the lives of 9,000 of this number. And only 1,684 Hungarian Jews reached the safety of Switzerland, among them all the relatives and friends of Dr. Kastner. (In 1954, Kastner lost in an Israeli court a libel suit against Malkiel Grunwald, a Hungarian Jew who accused him of betraying Jews to Eichmann. In March 1957, he was assassinated in Tel Aviv by members of a terrorist group "as a warning to all traitors.")

Embittered by the failure of his grandiose scheme, Eichmann avenged himself by intensifying the extermination drive, even beyond instructions from above. It has been established that between the middle of September and the middle of October 1944, Himmler twice ordered that "the crematoria at Auschwitz be dismantled." But Eichmann deliberately ignored these orders, and in October there were extensive "selections" at Birkenau of Jews from Theresienstadt, Italy, and the Cracow region. It was not before November 17 that he acknowledged the new disposition.

The Jerusalem correspondent of the New York Times reported that "many Israelis now wish that the agents who tracked Eichmann to his hiding place abroad had murdered him on the spot. . . . They are worried that a long, acrimonious public trial . . . will do more harm than good . . . they fear the effect on Israel as ugly details unfold of how safety could sometimes be bought for Jews and was not done. They are concerned about the effect so horrid a story would have on their children."

Such apprehension, voiced by fearful minds and tender souls, offers a powerful additional justification — if any was needed — for a full-fledged public airing of the Eichmann story. If this leads to the discovery of a few ugly skeletons in some venerable family closets, it can't — and even shouldn't — be helped. And if the younger generation of Israelis, which has been so disturbingly indifferent or complacent as to the recent tragic past of Diaspora Jewry, is awakened to the harsh facts of life, then all the better. It is difficult to be in sympathy with the Jerusalem mother who told the Times correspondent, "I don't want my children to grow up full of hates" and was therefore prepared to leave them in blissful ignorance of the tragedy of the Eichmann era.

Jewry's Long Chain Of Books

BY MARVIN LOWENTHAL, FAMED AUTHOR AND BIBLIOPHILE

This article is based on addresses given at the Henry Meyers Memorial Library of the Detroit Jewish Community Centre; and the annual meeting of the National Jewish Welfare Board's Jewish Book Council. The full text appears in Vol. 18 of the "Jewish Book Annual", published by the Jewish Book Council.

Whenever a Jewish community opens for general use a roomful of pertinent books, it constitutes the latest link in the long chain of Jewish libraries, public and private, which stretches back to a misty and dateless antiquity. No one any longer knows the nature or the precise origin of the first Jewish or, better said, Hebrew library. Ancient Israel arose in a highly civilized region; and libraries are indispensable to civilization. Vast collections of books, written, to be sure, on clay rather than paper, have survived from the royal libraries of Nineveh and Babylon, collections whose earliest material, whose first editions, date from nearly five thousand years ago.

Of Israel itself, only hints are left us. There was a city in the territory of Judah, originally a Canaanite city, which Joshua calls Kiriat-Sefer, that is, Book-Town — a name later changed to Debir, itself perhaps related to the Hebrew term for "word". When the prophet Samuel wrote a book on the character of the kingdom which the Israelites insisted upon adopting, he "laid" the book "up before the Lord", that is to say, he put it into the safekeeping of a sacred, priestly library, possibly at Shiloh. To put a book in a sacred-shrine was a way of preserving not only the document itself but the integrity of its text. The Greeks often employed the same safeguards; it was the ancient equivalent of taking out a copyright.

There must have been a library, a collection of archives at least, in the celebrated First Temple at Jerusalem. It was not any too well run, or so circumstantial evidence would imply. During the eighteenth year of his reign (621 B.C.E.) King Josiah ordered the Temple to undergo necessary repairs. While the repairs were in progress, probably in the stackroom, a book was discovered which had long been lost to sight and mind. Tradition holds that it was the Book of the Law, or the Torah; modern scholarship identifies it as the presumably newly-written Book of Deuteronomy.

The first individual Jew credited with the creation of a public library was Nehemiah, one of the happy few who led in the restoration of Jerusalem after the return from the Babylonian captivity. The Second Book of the Maccabees tells how Nehemiah, "founding a library, gathered together the acts of the kings and the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning the kings concerning the holy gifts" (2:13). Certainly the compilers of the two Books of Chronicles, the last historical writings included in the canonical Hebrew Scriptures, had at their disposal a rather extensive library, possibly the one founded by Nehemiah. The contents included all of the books now contained in the Hebrew Bible, except, of course, for such miscellaneous works as were not yet written. It also included a goodly number of books cited and sometimes tantalizingly described in Kings and Chronicles, but which are lost forever. I count twenty-one of these vanished treasures.

No doubt somebody at some time or another must have borrowed these fascinating books and, as borrowers will, disappeared with them into oblivion. What says Ben Sirach? "Many persons, when a thing is lent them, reckon it to be something they found."

Yet, despite the depredations of borrowers, books multiplied and libraries grew. Koheleth has an immortal word on this proliferation:—"of making many books there is no end". Probably the speediest and most copious output in the annals of the ancient publication trade is recorded in the Second Book of Esdras (14:14); in forty days five men under the dictation of Ezra wrote down 204 different books composed on the spot. The last seventy of them, incidentally, were placed under what librarians today called restricted circulation: in this instance they were issued only to such readers "as be wise among the people." But the account smacks more of Talmudic midrash than of fact.

When the Talmud was in the process of composition, during the first two centuries before and after the start of the Common Era, the rabbinical schools had at their command, among more conventional library material, what might be termed a talking book. For a long while the rabbis were loath to commit to writing their prime source material, the Mishnah or Oral Law, which was the basic subject of their studies, commentaries, opinions, and arguments. Writing down the Oral Law, they felt, might impair the authoritative quality which came from its being par excellence the "unwritten" Law. They were also afraid that scribes, who could not be checked up on the spot and at once, might be led into making editorial changes or else what we know today as typographical errors.

So they trained a band of young men, usually not bright enough to think of anything divergent to learn the Mishnah by heart; and when an assembly of scholars wished to refer to this or that original Mishnah text, about which there might be some dispute as to how it ran, one of these young men would reel it off verbatim. These human parrots had powerful, well-developed memories and not too much intelligence. Curiously enough, our ultra-modern libraries are resorting to this old Talmudic method, though for a different purpose; we have transformed the young men into robots known as tape-recordings.

Independent of the scholarly or literary merit of their contents, the Dead Sea Scrolls, dating from just before the dawn of the Common Era, have a dramatic interest which has captured our imaginations. The drama is multiple. The discovery and subsequent adventures of the scrolls is exciting enough, but it is more than matched by what must have been the dramatic scene and circumstance of their original entombment in the remote caves above the Wadi Qumran. Facing dire peril and perhaps extermination, the devout "yahad" or brotherhood, being a Jewish community, wrapped, double-wrapped, sealed in jars, and hid away their most precious possession, their library. They showed in this a true and enviable sense of community values.

By its very nature, traditional Judaism is a religion, a view of life and a way of life, inextricably dependent upon books; and with the passage of time and with the many varied and changing worlds to which the Jews found they had to adapt themselves, the necessary books grew more numerous and the dependence upon them more imperative. Mohammed called the Jews "the people of the book," meaning of course the Hebrew Bible, but "the people of books" would be more accurate. Besides the Bible, an adequate Jewish library had to possess the many-volumed Talmud, a whole arsenal of later digests, commentaries and case-books, an array of prayer-books and other devotional literature, and, by the early Middle Ages, shelves of philosophic speculations, mystical and cabbalistic works, anthologies of fables, parables, and anecdotes (the Midrashim), moral disquisitions, as the figure-skating contests of the next several days, winning medal after medal in competition against representatives of Austria, Norway, Finland, Sweden, Russia, and other countries. Members of the Czar's household together with many high officials marvelled at Rubinstein's graceful artistry on the ice. He executed with grand precision his figure-eights, and his threes and rolls brought down appreciative applause. The judges were thoroughly impressed. Rubinstein was without doubt a master performer.

CANADIAN MEMORIES

Later in the afternoon on the final day of the tournament Rubinstein sat in a little wooden hut on the edge of the St. Petersburg open-air skating rink. Tomorrow he would leave the Czar's benighted domain and be a free Canadian once again. He wondered how he had managed so well when his nerves were jarred by the miserable treatment accorded him. But tomorrow he would be a free man, he consoled himself.

There was a knock on the door. In walked Sir Robert Morier accompanied by the three judges. Rubinstein rose to welcome them.

"Well, Rubinstein," said the British Ambassador, smiling, "I confess that I was beginning to doubt seriously that you were going to get a square show! I am delighted to inform you that you have gotten just that." Each of the judges stepped forward one by one and pinned another medal on the flustered Rubinstein's jacket. The judges stepped back.

"Mr. Ambassador," spoke the new international champion, with a tremor in his voice, "would you tell these gentlemen that I thank them and that I look forward to the day when L. Rubinstein, Jew, and all his fellow Jews will be given a 'square show' in St. Petersburg and in all of Russia." Rubinstein paused. Then, looking wistfully at the medals he said to the Ambassador, "Your Excellency, when that day comes we'll give them our very best, too".

well as grammars, dictionaries, geographies, astronomies, travel accounts, and medical treatises.

Every Jewish community in the Middle Ages — which for most Jews lasted well into the 18th century — possessed a library, large or small, of this nature. It was usually housed in the synagogue, which was literally the community center, or else in the Bet Hamidrash or House of Study. The community was dependent upon this library not only for recreation and for a fruitful way of investing one's time, but for the proper exercise of Judaism itself, for the maintenance of economic and social justice within the community's gates, for the adjustment of a thousand private, conflicting interests, and for the true worship of God. Study for the Jew, is also prayer. Hillel, in words that you will find in your Sabbath prayer-book, said: "Do not say, When I have leisure I will study; perhaps you will have no leisure. Yet an empty-headed man cannot be a sin-fearing man, nor can an ignorant person be pious, nor can a shame-faced man learn, nor a passionate man teach, nor anyone who is overmuch engaged in business grow wise." For centuries the Jews transferred these words from prayer-book precepts into daily practice in the synagogue library or at home by a book-laden, candle-lit table.

Besides the community libraries there were naturally certain fortunate individuals possessed of well-stock book shelves. Lists and catalogues have survived of private medieval collections. Judah ben Saul Ibn Tibbon, a famous 12th century scholar and translator, has left us the injunctions he laid upon his son for the care of his library: keep the books, he enjoins, well covered against dust and damp and protected from mice; write a list of the books placed on each shelf, affix the list to the shelf, and arrange the books in the same order as on the list; check over the Hebrew books once every month, the Arabic books every two months, and the cases of unbound works every three months; restore and have restored all loaned books on Passover and on Succot. It was Ibn Tibbon who wrote some of the most gracious and inviting words ever applied to a library: "Let your cases and shelves be your pleasure-grounds and orchards." I would like to see this motto inscribed in every Jewish community library, which like all libraries should be enjoyed for both its delights and its fruits.

One of the great private collectors was the 17th century "court Jew" of Vienna, Samuel Oppenheimer. Eventually his 7,000 printed volumes and 1,000 manuscripts became the basis of the Bodleian Library's magnificent collection of Judaica (at Oxford). The earliest modern communal collection of which the precise origin can be dated was that of Mantua in Italy; it was founded in 1767 upon the acquisition of 4,500 volumes from the private library of Raphael Emanuel Mendola.

In the communal libraries, the study halls, of old Jewish centers, whether in North Africa or in Europe, the very appearance of the books piled on the shelves or scattered on the tables told a story. For the most part they looked woe-begone, draggled, and worm-eaten, not, however, because they were neglected but because they were used until they were virtually used up. The best books are the worst preserved, because they are the best treated, for what better treatment of a book can there be than to read it so often that its pages fall apart?

The National Jewish Welfare Board's Jewish Book Council of America has set forth eight minimum requirements which must be met by any communal library if it wishes to be accorded a "Citation of Merit" from the Council. I would urge and underline a ninth requirement: that a fair proportion of its books be read to shreds.

(One hundred and thirty libraries sponsored by Jewish Community Centers, Synagogues, Jewish schools and other community agencies have received citations of merit from the Jewish Book Council of America. To win this citation a library must be at least a year old; have one room set aside for its exclusive use; be staffed by a full or part-time librarian; have a fixed annual budget; contain a minimum of 1,000 Jewish books in any language; acquire a minimum of 100 new Jewish books during the previous year; have a catalogue accessible to all readers; be open at least 10 hours a week; and participate actively in Jewish Book Month activities and other projects that enrich Jewish culture.)

The purpose of a library is to be used; a library without readers, especially zealous readers, is just a cut above a library that doesn't exist. There is no public prestige or morale-boosting to be gained from the mere presence of a collection of books. A Jewish community library has a unique function of its own in relation to the community it serves. As things stand today, every Jewish community must look upon itself as a reservoir of forces devoted to the cultivation, enrichment, and survival of Jewish life. Conceivably it may not be a large reservoir, but it will be deep, and it will be fed by unfailing springs. These springs well up from within the books which contain the ever-living waters, the mayim hayim, of the Jewish tradition. Only to the degree that these waters are regularly imbibed by the individual members of our local communities will Jewish life thrive in America.

Life in any Diaspora land sets up powerful currents and counter-attractions against the maintenance of an informed, vigorous Jewish culture. The Jewish library, the Jewish school, and the Jewish home, even when working together, will have a hard enough struggle to prevent the gradually complete evaporation of Jewish knowledge and values. Neither library, school, nor home can afford to go it alone, and victory can be had only at the price of constant co-operation and effort. We can hope that some day this victory will be seen in the shabby, dog-eared, dilapidated condition of the books stacked in every communal library; these veterans will bear, like trophies, the scars of a triumphant campaign.

A book, after all, is chiefly an instrument for enabling us to master the art of living. David Ben-Gurion, the valiant prime minister of Israel, summed up three thousand years of history when he said, "We have preserved the Book and the Book has preserved us."
